Video games could have a serious role to play in the classroom, a survey of teachers and students suggests.

The Teaching with Games report was (41 ____) by games giant Electronic Arts (EA) and carried out by FutureLab.

It surveyed almost 1,000 teachers and more than 2,300 primary and secondary school students in the UK.

The survey found 59% of teachers would consider using (42 ____) games in the classroom while 62% of students wanted to use games at school.

The report, which was also backed by Microsoft, Take Two, as well as the Interactive Software Federation of Europe (ISFE), found evidence of (43 ____) from both teachers and students about the impact of games on players: more than 70% of the surveyed teachers felt that playing games could lead to anti-social behavior while 30% of students believed that playing games could lead to increased violence and aggression.

The report authors also followed 12 teachers at four schools in the UK and looked at ways they could use commercial software in the classroom.

The authors concluded that there was "still a generational (44 ____) between teachers and students in respect of computer games play": more than 70% of teachers never play games outside school while 82% of children said they played video games at least once a fortnight. Mr Clarkson (45 ____) the report was an attempt to be "taken seriously" by the educational establishment.

He said: "We are already taken seriously and we take our responsibilities as a leader in the industry very seriously."

Fred Hasson, chief executive of games developer association Tiga, one of the backers of the London Games Festival, said the event reflected the (46 ____) of the UK industry.

"The UK is not only the third largest market for video games it is also the third largest producer of games in the world."

He said the industry was in good (47 ____) following several years of consolidation.

"In the 2000 there were about 400 UK development studios while now there are about 150."

"But I don't think there are any fewer numbers of people working in the industry overall."

"With the (48 ____) consoles, the current hardware and next generation hardware on the horizon, there has never been as much work around as there is now."

Rob Cooper, managing director of Ubisoft UK and chairman of the festival said: "Now more than ever people are starting (49 ____) to the important stage, one which allows our industry to show every aspect of itself."

He added: "From students wanting to (50 ____) a career in gaming, to budding developers who want to share ideas for future gamers. There will be events of interest to so many groups of people."
